

As a Ph.D. student, investigating and helping fix problems for continued improvement is a primary goal. Unfortunately, with Covid 19, an essential aspect of meeting colleagues and exchanging experiences in person has been lost.

As a fourth-year student, I still haven't attended an in-person conference. To remediate this, I organized a reading group inviting guests and old lab mates for my research lab to bring back this exchange aspect, which I believe is fundamental in a Ph.D. journey.

With the work OAuth 2.0 Redirect URI Validation Falls Short, Literally, I had the chance to remotely meet with the OAuth working group, and the interaction we had made me desire to be part of this community and help the research community. Participating in the Conference will allow me to interact with experts, fully representing my goal of cooperating internationally to develop standards defining cyberspace's backbone.

The support of the ACSA can make this desire come true, allowing me to participate in this annual meeting, exchange my experience, present my paper to the research community, and learn from each member, significantly increasing my professional network and paving the way to be a part of the community.
